"The statistics of the States which have abolished capital punishment do not show any greater proportion of murders to population than before; neither do they show any greater proportion of murders than similar communities where the death penalty is inflicted. Public sentiment is such that it is more difficult to obtain convictions where the death penalty is in vogue. It is true that occasionally a man is put to death who is innocent of the crime for which he is convicted. It is also true that many men escape conviction, who committed the murder, who would have been convicted if the punishment had been less than that of death."
